November was a mixed month for global financial markets despite ongoing growth in the US economy. In equity markets the large cap semiconductors and telecom companies led US gains while European stocks declined, mainly driven by poor performance in France, Spain and the UK. Asian equities were mixed with gains in developed countries like Japan and Australia being offset by losses in China and other emerging countries. Global rates remained fairly unchanged, US rates, however, slightly increased. On the currency front, the US Dollar depreciated against major currencies. Within commodities, energy commodities as well as platinum and cotton traded higher.

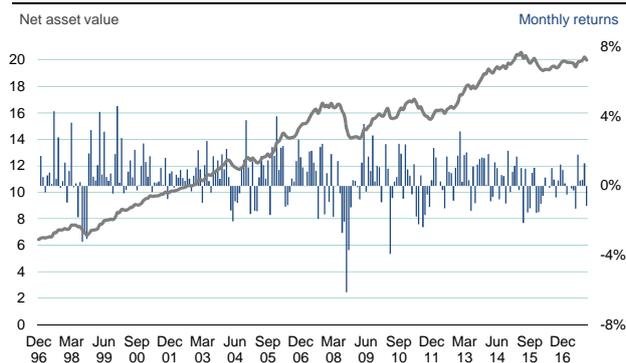

The portfolio ended in negative territory as most strategies were down for the month. The largest deduction came from Global Macro managers, where trading in commodities and currencies in particular was unprofitable. Within Event Driven, the largest deduction came from an European manager. Long/Short Equity managers had a mixed month with best results from a macro-driven strategy, while largest deductions came from strategies focusing on Brazil and Australia. Within CTAs, we observed a high dispersion with better results from trend-followers as a group, as compared to short-term traders. However, CTAs also failed to offer diversification benefit.
